How to Engage Students in Remote Learning for digital learners

Compliance and Participation

What does compliance and participation look like?

Compliance is when learners are following the rules and behavioral expectations set forth for them. Compliance is necessary in any productive group setting.

Participation is when learners are completing assignments, answering questions, and/or completing other designated tasks. When learners participate, they are doing an assigned job.

Motivation

How do you inspire internal motivation in a remote learning classroom?

Internal motivation is a learner’s inspiration. It’s what propels a learner to begin a task, take action, etc. External motivation, such as rewards, should be avoided! Motivation is grounded in classroom relationships. We are inspired by those we have some connection to.

Build Relationships

Focus on relationships first. Take time to connect with each learner individually, more often at first, and then with some regularity. This can be through one-on-one meetings, providing feedback on student work, emails, phone calls, etc.

Collaboration

Create frequent opportunities for learners to collaborate. Yes, we mentioned collaboration earlier, but it really is that important. Inspiration often comes from our peers and we’re often motivated to dig deeper and do more when working with peers.

Connect with Families

Provide opportunities for connection with learners’ families. Host virtual office hours, post regular announcements, and have a consistent platform for communicating with parents.

Honor Diversity

Make learners from all cultural backgrounds feel welcomed, accepted, and valued. This can be accomplished by intentionally modifying lessons to integrate the history, literature, arts, and perspectives of the ethnicities and nationalities represented in your class. Inviting students, families, or local cultural leaders to speak about their experiences.

Engage Diversity

What does engagement look like?

Engagement is happening when learners are completely absorbed in the task at hand. There will be an absence of a sense of time, and the world around them seems to vanish.
